

praetorian prefect of Italy.⁵⁸ It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the disasters around 410 dented the self-confidence of the cities of southern Italy, to the point that they abandoned what appears to have been still a fairly lively tradition of erecting honorific statues.⁵⁹

At the very end of the statue habit, a lack of the considerable technical competence needed to produce life-sized three-dimensional images may even have played a small part in finally killing off new statuary. Our evidence suggests, however, that where there was the will, the means to erect statues could generally be found: for instance, when the inhabitants of two cities in Thrace (one of them a minor centre) decided to honour military men of the mid- to late fifth century, long after the statue habit had disappeared from the region, somehow they were able to do this (LSA 10 and 367). We should also note that late antique awarders of statues were often happy to take substantial short cuts in producing 'new' statues, by lightly adapting earlier material for their dedications. For instance, when the inhabitants of Side wanted to set up a group of statues to the emperors of one of the tetrarchies, they took heroic nudes of the Julio-Claudian period and simply recarved the heads (LSA 245 and 246). The universality of this practice shows up clearly in our database, where late antique heads abound, while late antique bodies are rare.

It is also clear that patrons could be satisfied with a finished result that we would regard as technically substandard. In sculpture, the best examples of this are a group of statues to late antique imperial office-holders in Corinth, the capital of the province of Achaia and therefore close to the centre of Greek cultural aspirations (LSA 19, 22-4, and 80; Figs 14.5 and 14.12). These are highly schematic in their rendering of drapery and do not remotely approach the sophistication and finish of the best contemporary work, for example, at Aphrodisias. In one case (LSA 22), a naked foot and part of the lower drapery of an earlier female image, that was adapted to celebrate the late antique honorand, were left clearly visible. The same (to us technically shoddy) approach can be found in many of the statue bases of the fourth and fifth centuries, which were probably almost all adapted from older material. For instance, one of the most prestigious statue bases of the early fifth century in Rome, set up to the Fides and Virtus of the emperor's armies in the centre of the Forum and facing the Senate House, is a re-used and damaged equestrian statue base set up on end, with metal repair clamps, which were presumably hidden under plaster, and with its original base and crown mouldings unaltered, although asymmetrical in their new vertical setting (LSA 1363, Fig. 10.4).

CONCLUSION

The decline of civic politics, with which honorific statuary was closely connected, was the most important cause of the decline of the statue habit; but it was not the only cause. Other developments played a role: above all, the rise of Christianity with its distrust of three-dimensional representation and its rejection (at least in theory) of worldly glory; increasing imperial regulation; perhaps even the loss of skills; and in one region, southern Italy, the barbarians played a walk-on part in the story. This is not to say, however, that our project has definitively 'solved' the problem of why the statue habit died in precisely the ways it did. For instance, we remain puzzled as to why new dedications ended in Africa so soon after they had had a revival in Valentinianic times, and why the cities of Asia Minor more or less stopped setting up statues to the emperor in the fifth century, while continuing to make dedications to lesser persons and while imperial statuary flourished in nearby Constantinople. Indeed, there can be no definitive answer as to why Heraclius finally broke with the tradition of accepting grandiose honorific monuments in Constantinople, preferring to place a cross on the column of his defeated rival than an image of himself (LSA 2775)—and thereby delivered the coup de grâce to the centuries-old statue habit.

⁵⁸ AD 400-409: LSA 327, 330, 339, 1413, 1808, 1862, 1934, 1942, 1973, 2030, 2039, and 2045. Post-409: LSA 324 (of AD 437 from Aricia).

CONCORDANCE

The following list provides for each LSA item a reference to its primary publication. After the running LSA number, the entries contain the following in abbreviated form: (1) category of evidence (base, statue, head, literary text); (2) name and/or category of honorand (emperor, governor, other office-holder); (3) city in which the honour was set up, awarded, or found; alternatively, for items, mainly of statuary, that have no documented provenance, city or museum in which item now located is given; (4) date, within knowable level of precision; and (5) reference to primary publication or corpus number.

All honorands are male except those for which the gender, f = female, is noted. On inscribed bases, honorands for whom no designation of office or other role is given should be assumed to be local notables of some sort. For surviving statuary, honorand categories are not given because they are usually not knowable with certainty. Unless otherwise noted, all items of surviving statuary are of white marble. Titles of abbreviated publications and corpora can be found in the Abbreviations (p. xxvii) or, for name-date citations, in the References (p. 372). The following abbreviations are also used.
